

2020 Deloitte Global Millennial Survey Report

Resilient generations hold the key to building a “better normal”

The impact of the pandemic hit millennials and Gen Zs hard. But this did not lead to an increase in uneasiness and pessimism as one might expect. Millennials and Gen Zs are resilient and they see this moment in time as a chance to reset.

They aren't just hoping for a better world to emerge after the pandemic, they want to lead the change.

Stress levels are down ...

% who say they're stressed all or most of the time

During the pandemic, stress levels have fallen slightly, perhaps thanks to spending more time with family and less time commuting in traffic jams or on packed trains and subways, and a general slowdown of life.

... but mental health is still a critical issue.

In the primary survey, 1 in 3 respondents cited they took time off of work in the past year because of stress. Millennials who were candid about their absences were 3 times as likely to say their organizations provided:

Climate change is a top concern for millennials and Gen Zs. Even as the pandemic unfolded around the world, this remained constant.

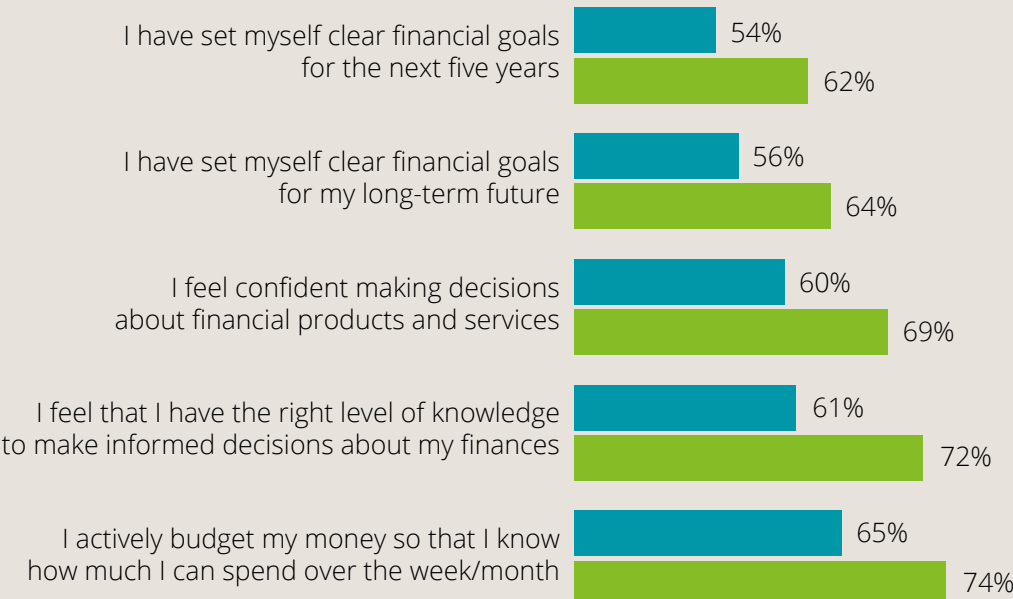

80% of pulse survey respondents think government and business need to make greater efforts to protect the environment, yet nearly two-thirds worry it will be less of a priority for both entities because of the economic impact of the pandemic.

Close to three in four millennials and Gen Zs said the pandemic has inspired them to make a positive impact on their communities.

Employers get high marks for their pandemic responses, but business must do more for society

3 in 5 millennials and Gen Zs think businesses have shown a genuine commitment to society during the pandemic (Apr 2019 – May 2020).

Despite positive reactions to business and employers' pandemic response, overall, millennials and Gen Zs do not believe business has a positive impact on society—down 10 points from their responses before the pandemic.
