Understanding the value proposal of outsourcing

The current complexity of doing business and maintaining a company with high competitive standards, has led company leaders and executives to assume several responsibilities. Many of these include non-core process activities, such as accounting, tax compliance and payroll. When these procedures are performed internally by the corporations, they may be a distraction for executives, who therefore cannot be completely involved in strategic business issues.

Business Process Solutions (BPS) services of Deloitte offer world-class systems and processes that maximize the efficiency of the operations and, therefore, increase the productivity and profitability of the business. This allows leaders and executives to delegate support processes to specialists and concentrate on key business activities that provide value to stockholders.

By outsourcing financial, operating, or technological activities, our clients have improved the performance of their processes, as well as reduced their cost structure, and with that, our services have become a strategic business tool.

The following are key indicators to define whether a business process should be outsourced:

- Having inneficient processes, which results in repeated errors, like missing information delivery dates, among others
- High internal operating costs
- High costs to train and update personnel regarding tax, operating, and software usage issues
- Accounting and management functions that lack the experience, resources, or technology necessary to fulfill their task
- Accessibility to new platforms and technological applications without having to purchase them, by using the structure created by a reputable outsourcing provider
- Leveraging economies of scale offered by the supplier by maintaining its software updated for tax changes and migration to new versions
- Spin-off or restructuring without sufficient business infrastructure
- Having processes with the market's best practices and continuous updates
- Immediate access to new operating methodologies
