

Turbocharging legal contract transformation in the age of generative AI

Is generative AI (GenAI) poised to transform the contracting process? Many legal operations professionals think so. Still, not all legal departments are prepared to take advantage of this breakthrough technology's capabilities. Here's what the 16th annual Law Department Operations Survey reveals about GenAI adoption in contract lifecycle management (CLM) and what legal operations can do to take it to the next level.¹

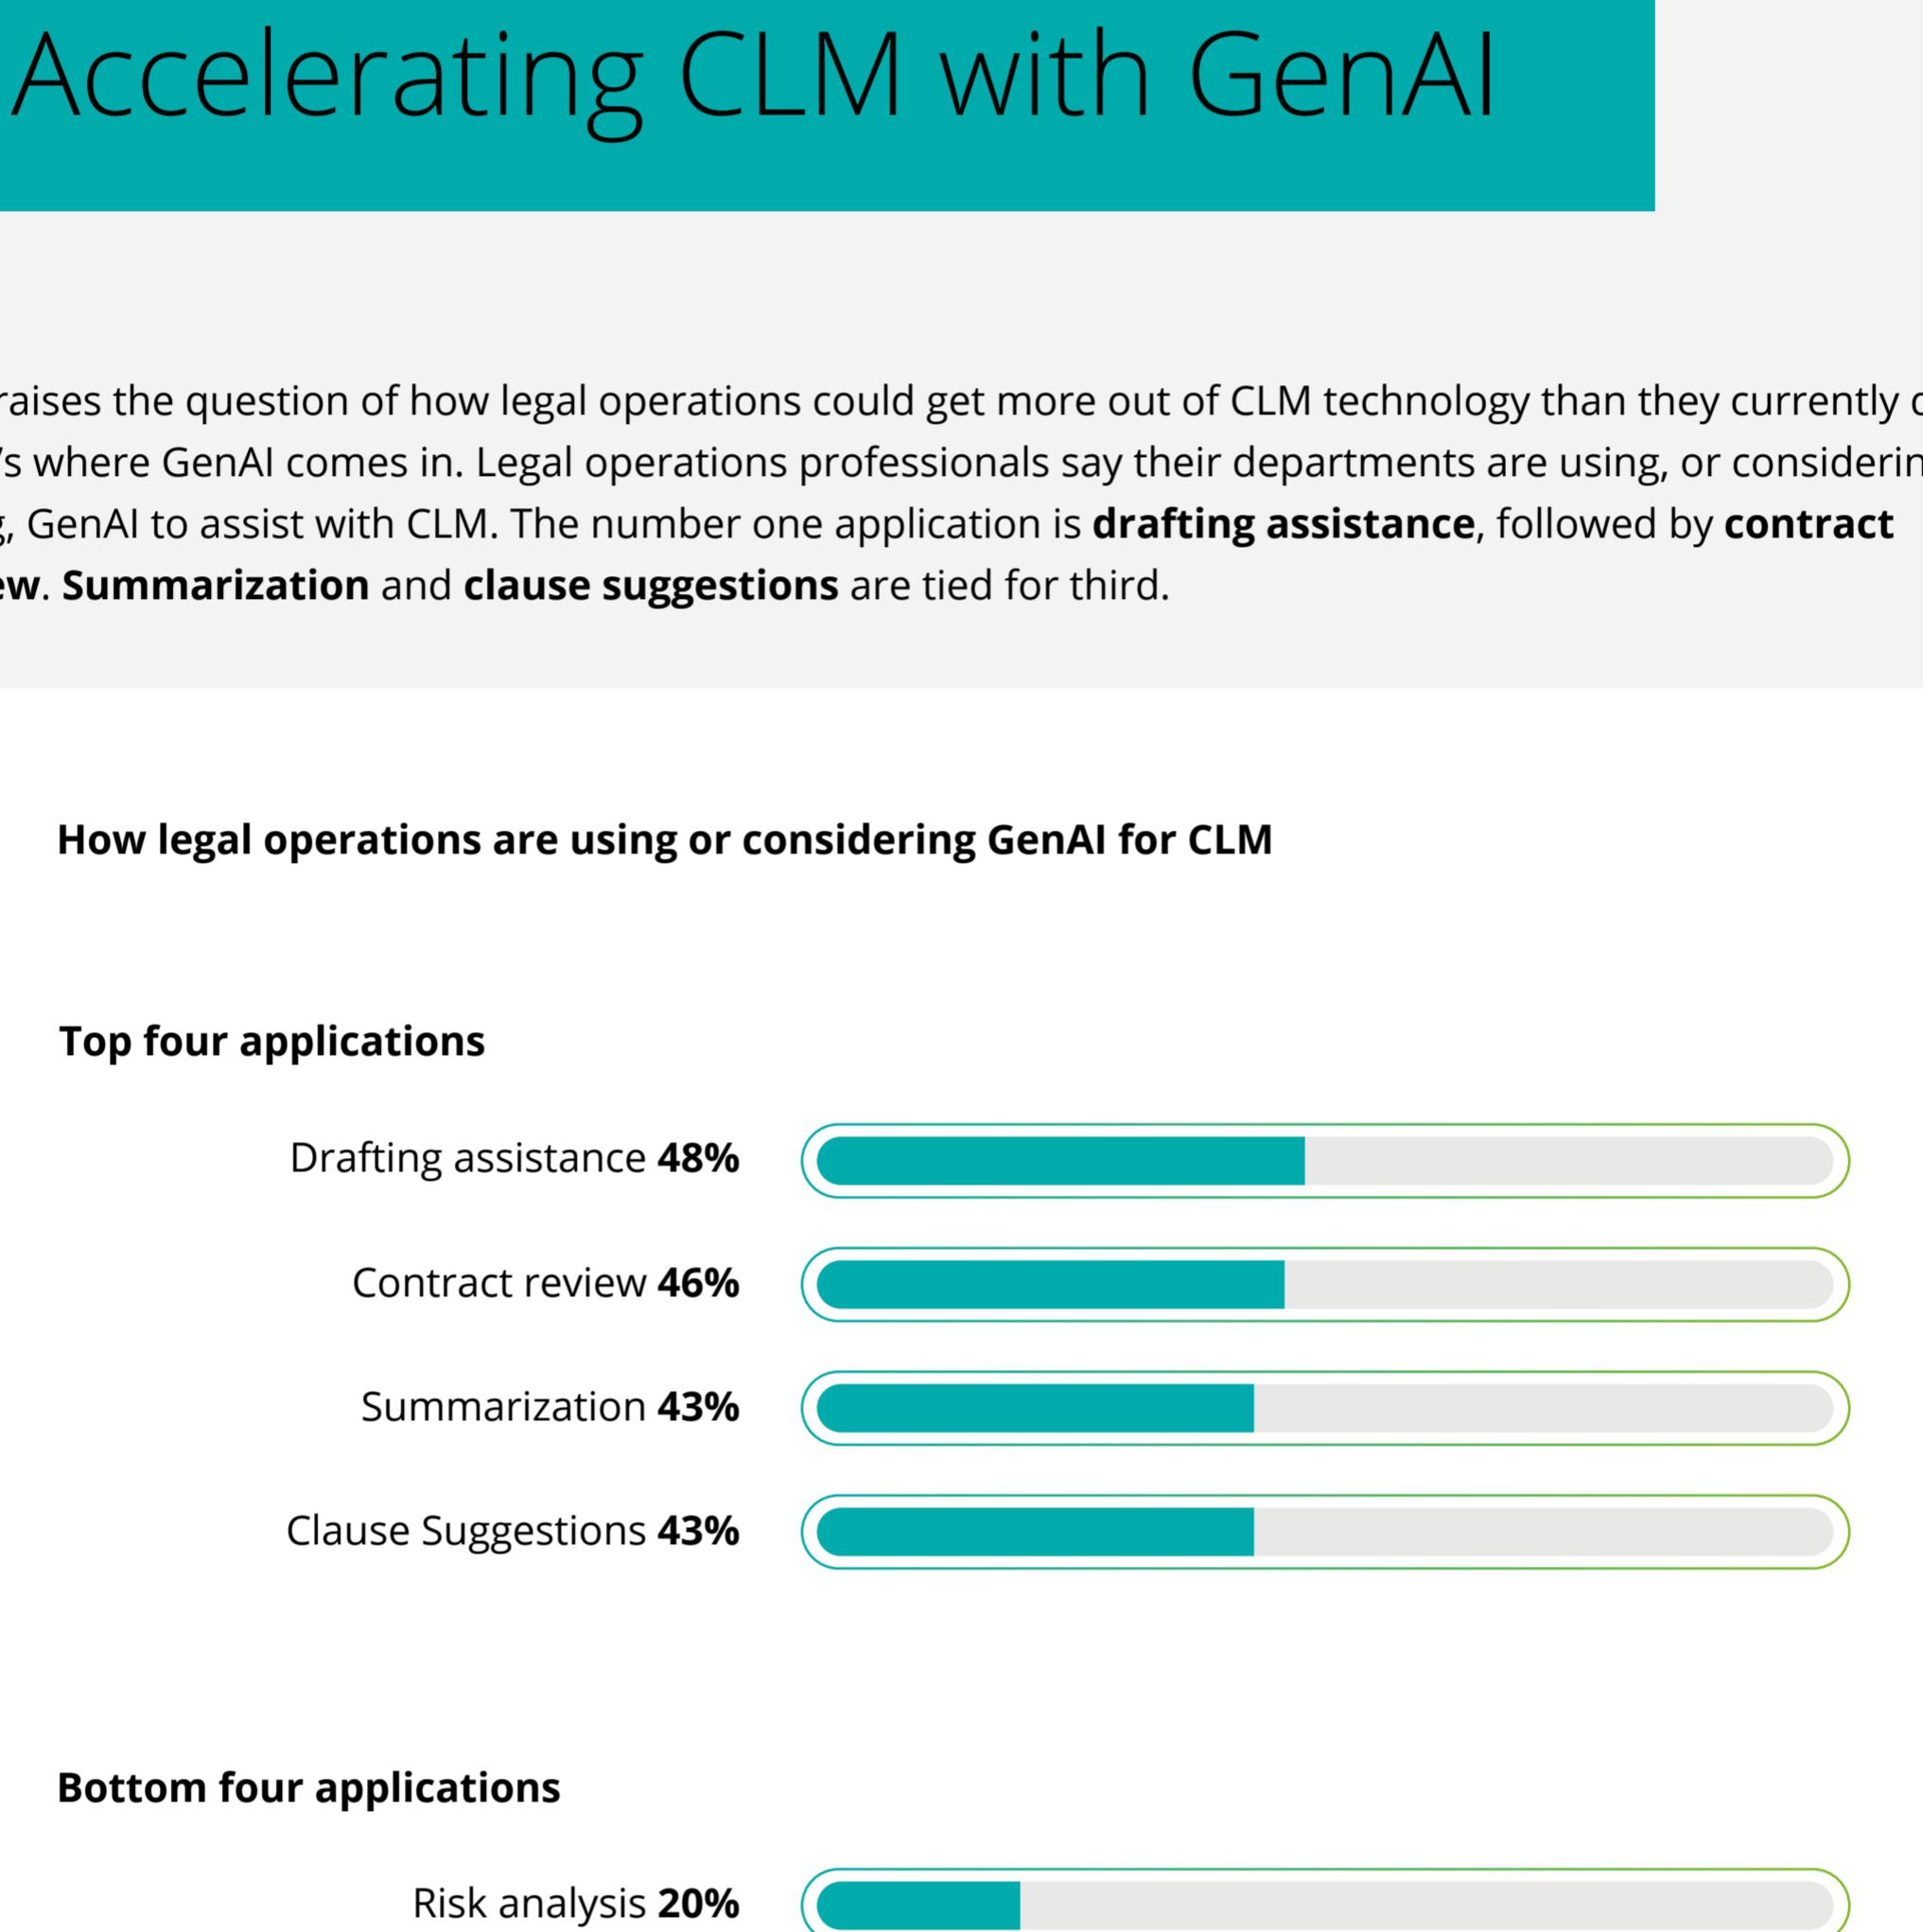

The technology gap

Today's legal departments face an ongoing set of challenges.

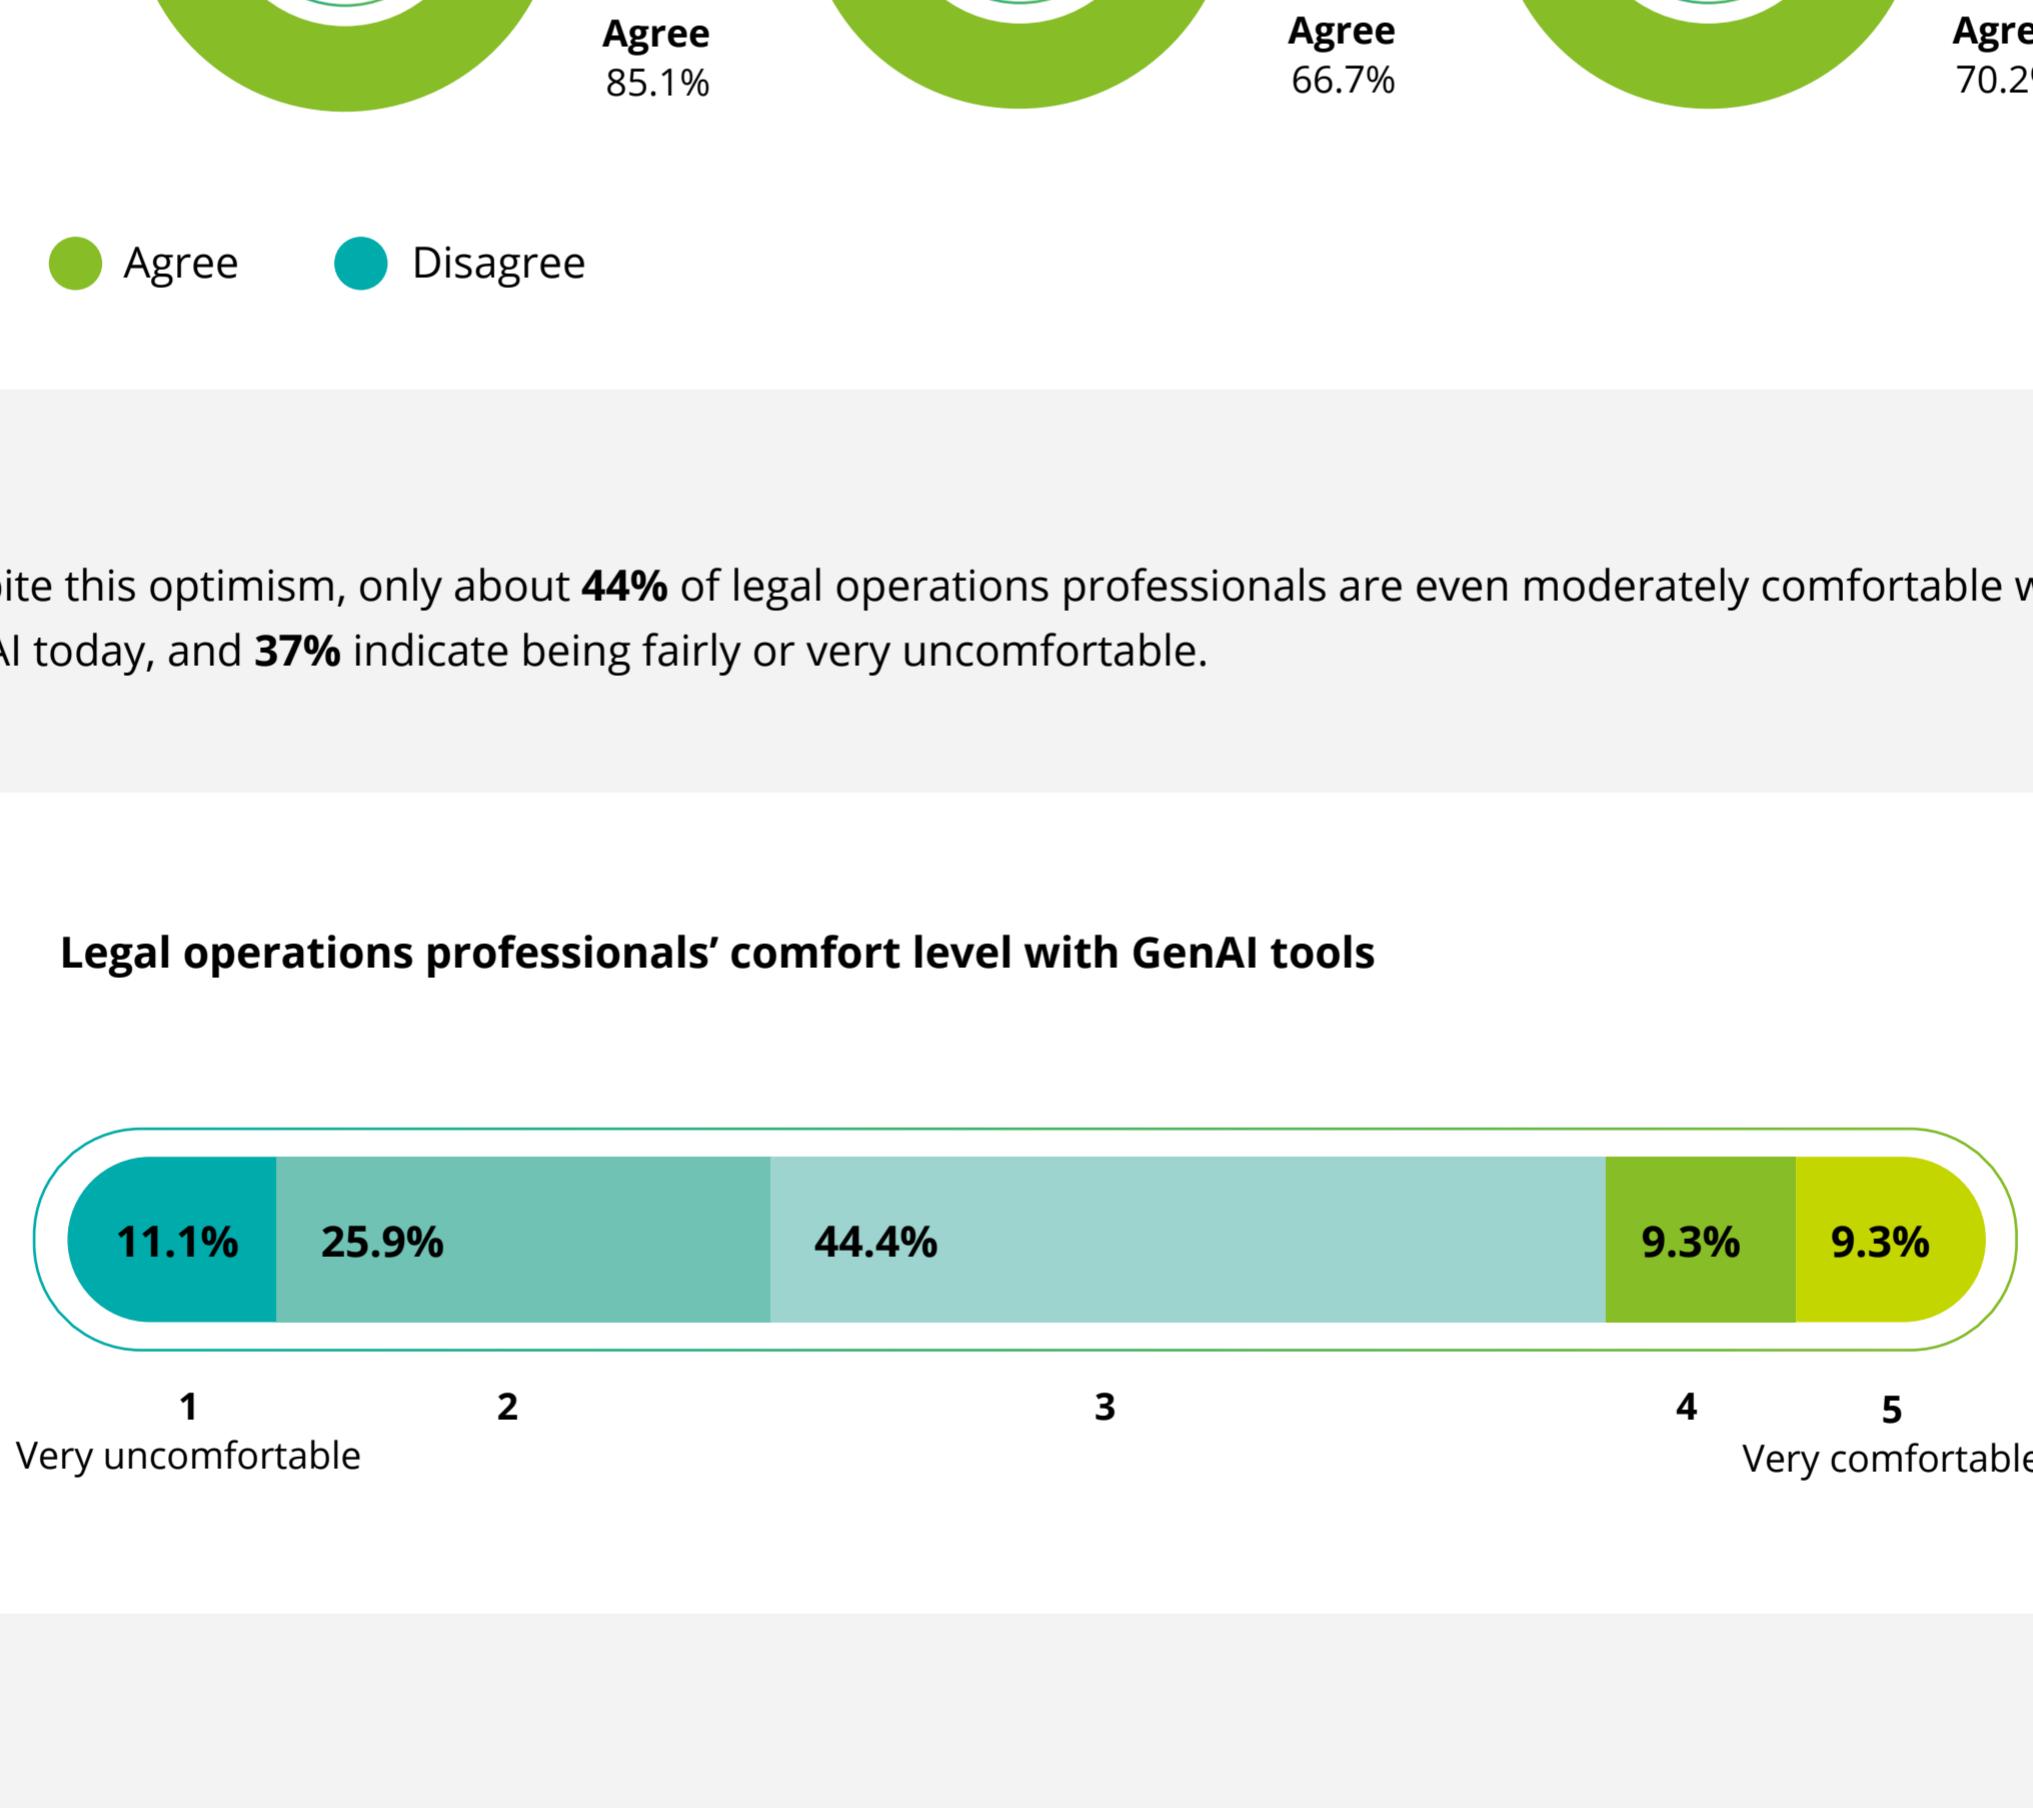

At the same time, fewer legal operations professionals report having access to the right technology to do their jobs. Only 66.7% say they do, down from 78.7% a year earlier.

Do you have access to the right technology to do your job?

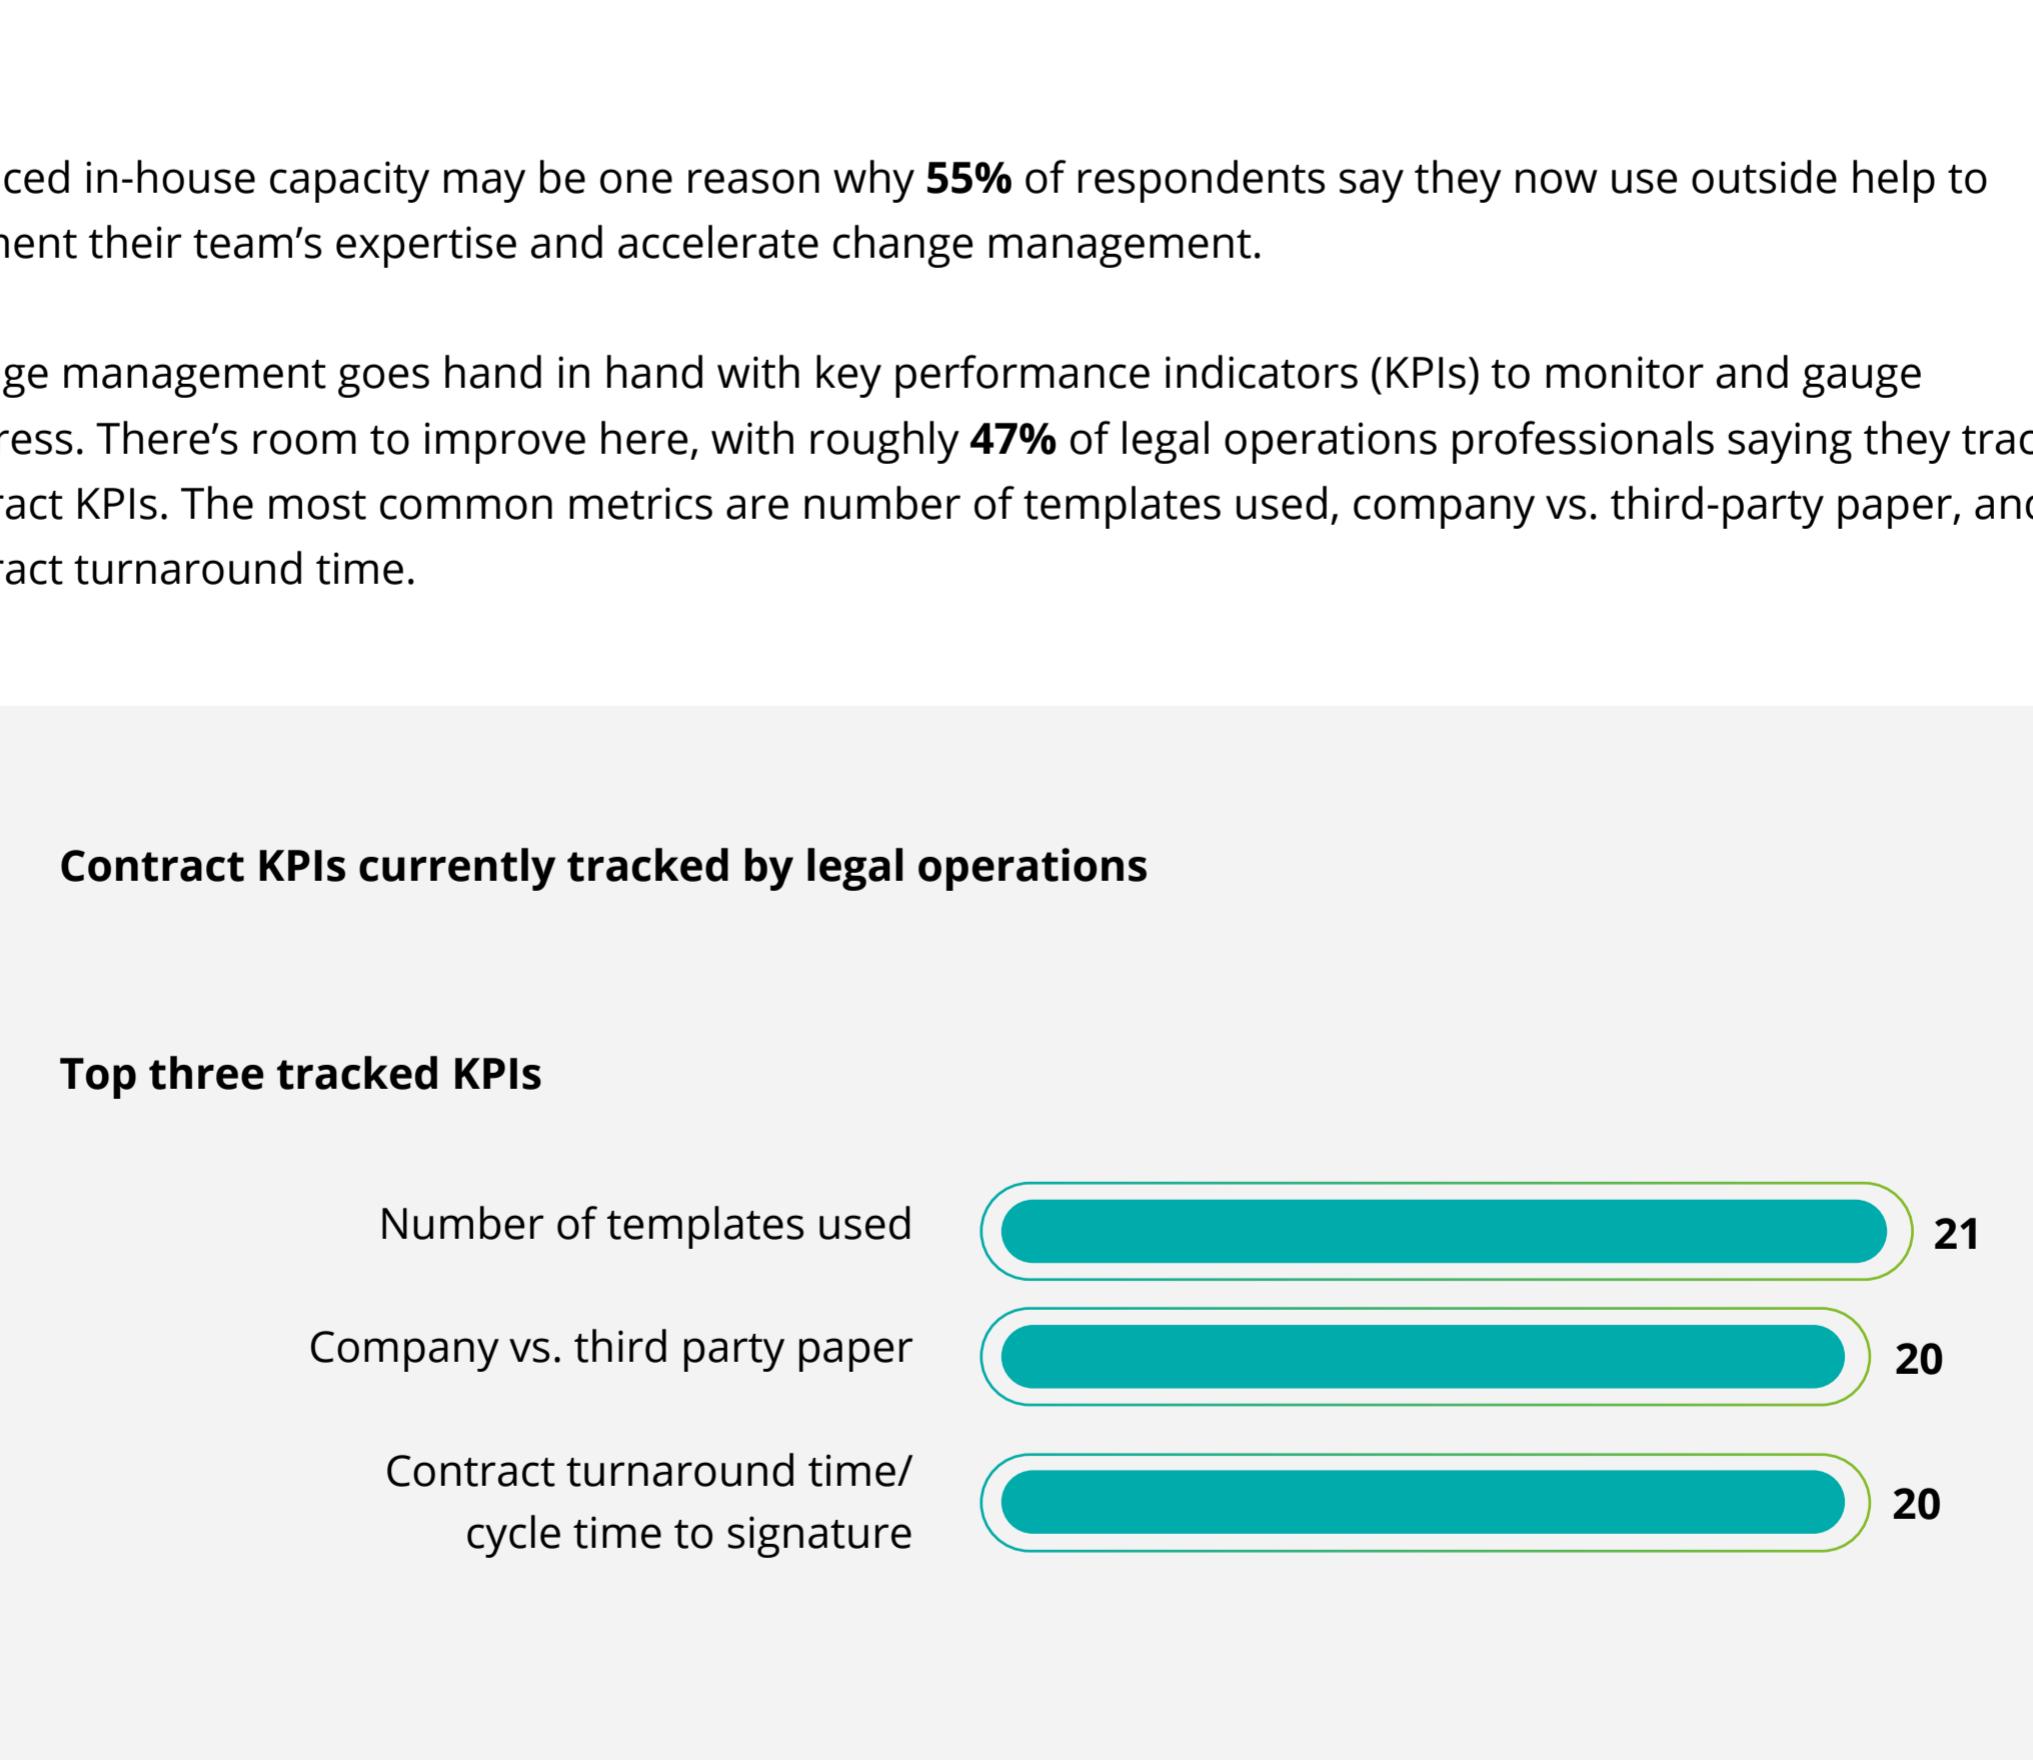

CLM is an example of this technology gap. A key responsibility of in-house lawyers is to understand the terms, obligations, risk factors, and intent of the organization's contracts. But only 52% of surveyed legal operations professionals report having CLM technology to support pre-execution contract work while 60% say they have it for post-execution work.

Adoption of CLM technology in the legal department

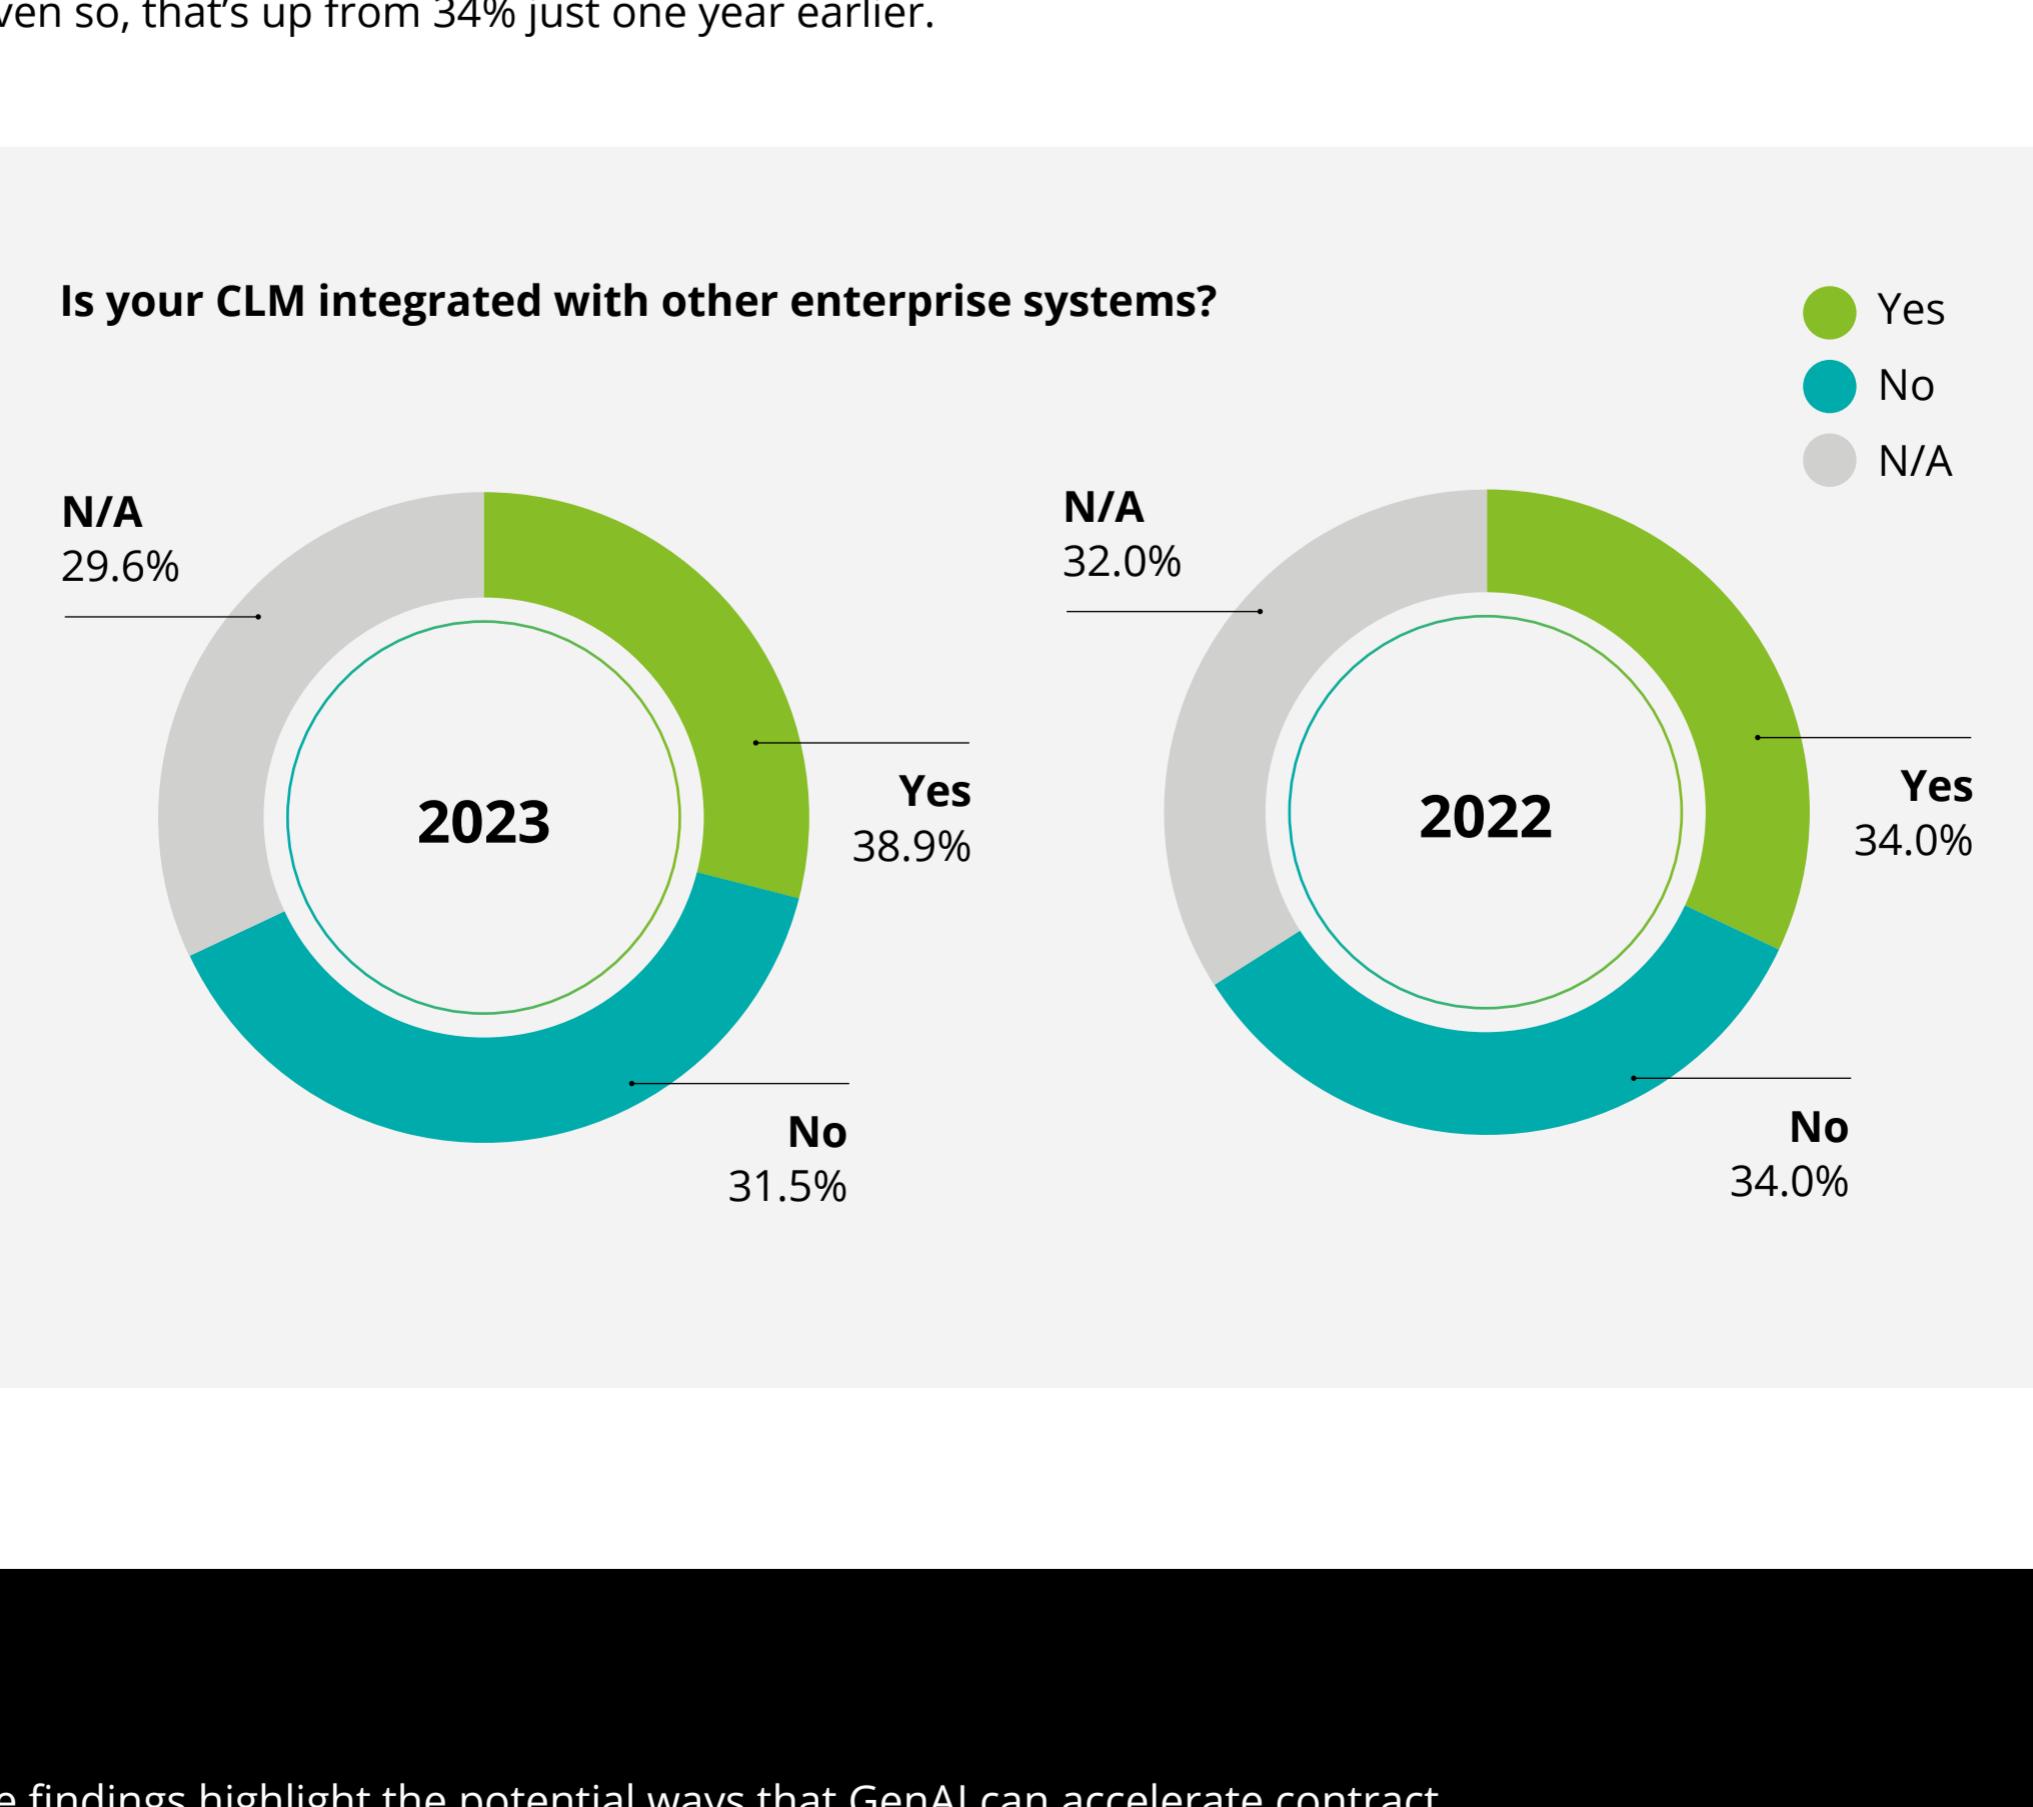

An even smaller share of respondents consider their contract operations mature. Just under 30% rate their pre-execution maturity at four or five on a five-point scale, even though 52% say they have technology to enable pre-execution contract work. The contrast is even starker for post-execution contract operations. Only about 14% rate their post-execution maturity at four or five, even though 60% say they have technology to support their work in this area.

Maturity of contract operations in the legal department

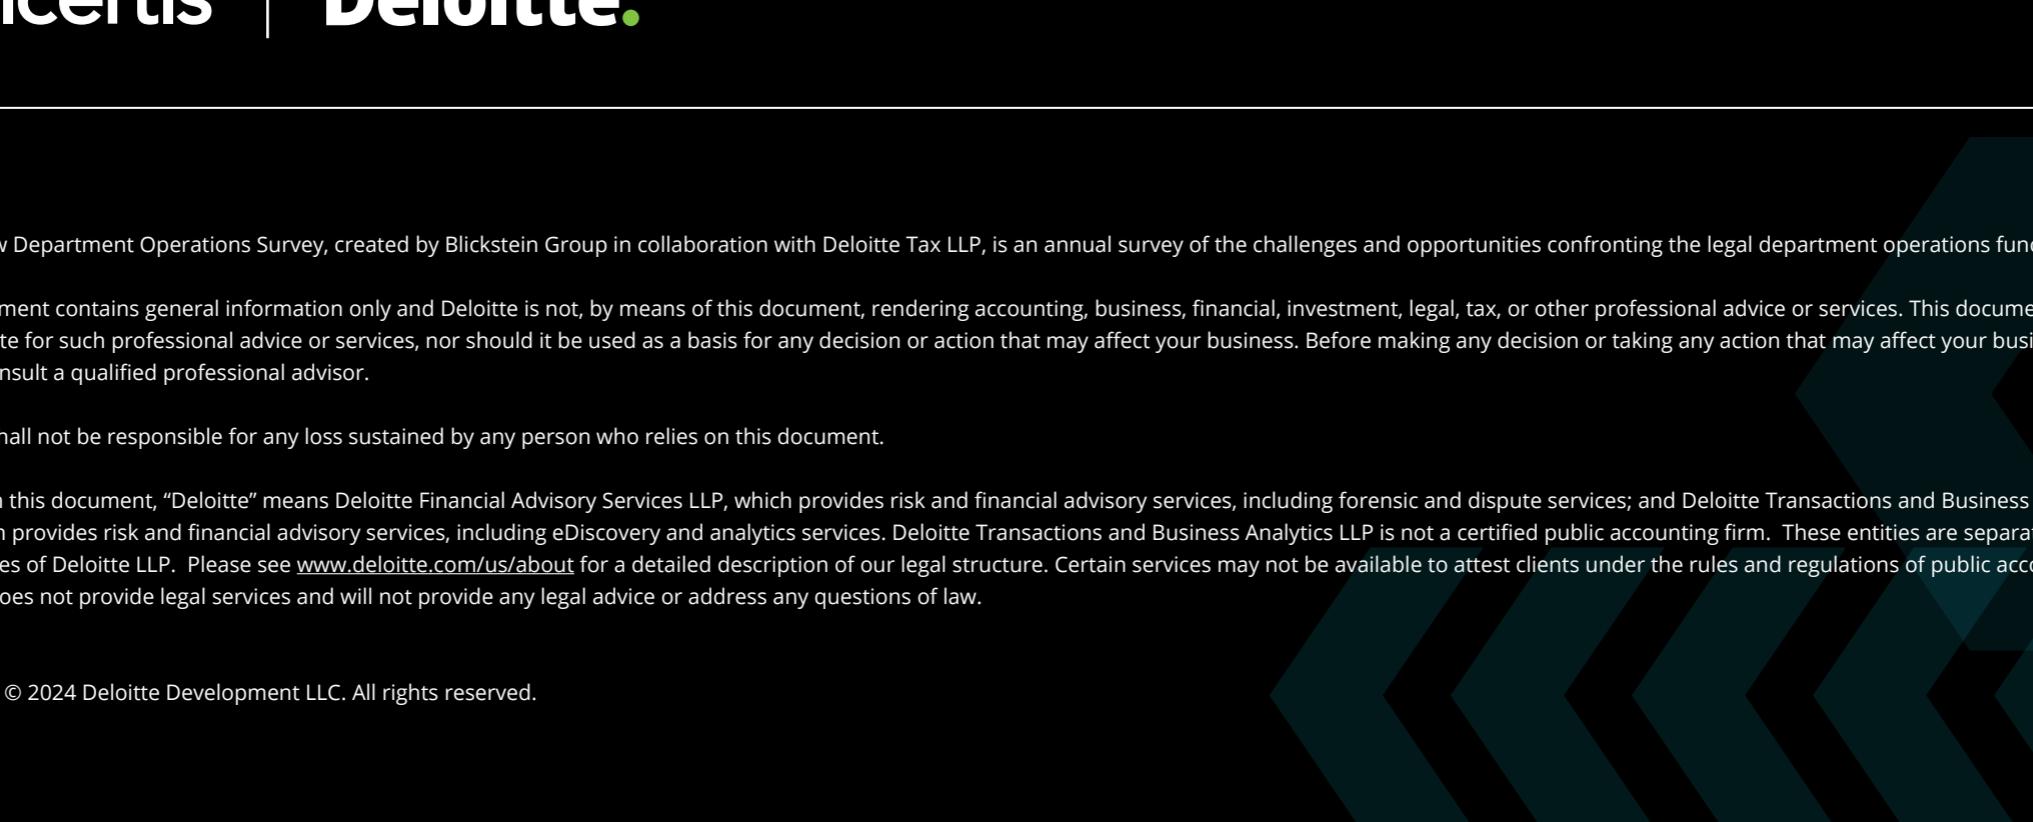

This raises the question of how legal operations could get more out of CLM technology than they currently do. Here's where GenAI comes in. Legal operations professionals say their departments are using, or considering using, GenAI to assist with CLM. The number one application is drafting assistance, followed by contract review. Summarization and clause suggestions are tied for third.

How legal operations are using or considering GenAI for CLM

Despite this optimism, only about 44% of legal operations professionals are even moderately comfortable with GenAI today, while 37% indicate being fairly or very uncomfortable.

Legal operations' comfort level with GenAI tools

Keys to successful transformation

The apparent paradox in these findings—many legal operations professionals believe in the utility of GenAI, are starting to use it with CLM, but are less comfortable with it—underlies the long-held observation that while 57% of legal operations professionals consider change management their primary job, this is down to 70% just one year earlier.

My job is primarily change management

Reduced in-house capacity may be one reason why 55% of respondents say they now use outside help to augment their team's expertise and accelerate change management.

Change management goes hand in hand with key performance indicators (KPIs) to monitor and gauge progress. There's room to improve here, with roughly 47% of legal operations professionals saying they track contract KPIs. The most common metrics are number of templates used, company vs. third-party paper, and contract turnaround time.

Contract KPIs currently tracked by legal operations

Another way legal operations can prepare to take advantage of GenAI is to create robust data pools for their CLM technology via integration with other enterprise systems (such as ERP, procurement, and financials). Here again, there's room for improvement, with 39% of respondents reporting that they're doing so. Even so, that's up from 34% just one year earlier.

Is your CLM integrated with other enterprise systems?
